Summary Paragraph

Located within the town of Lyndyl, the Princess Recreation Hall/Lyndyl LDS Meetinghouse is a one-story wood frame and stucco building, located at 98 East Center Street. It is situated in the north-east corner of the community park, with a sports court to the west and a grass sports field to the south and west. The building was originally a recreation hall constructed of wood frame and wood siding, with a basketball court and stage. In 1936-38, an addition was constructed to the west of the building for classrooms and other meeting space to accommodate the needs of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints' membership in the town. The structure now took on an "L" shape, with projecting entryways. The original building and the new addition were finished with a more modern stucco appearance, although it maintained a vernacular classical appearance. In 1983, a fire station was added to the south of the building and, although the outside was finished to match the 1936 stucco exterior, the inside of the new section was modern. However, the interior of the 1914/1936 church remodel was not altered. As of 2014, the interior still retains this layout and architectural detail, such as stained wood molding and interior wood doors. The structure has very simplistic features such as the wood decorative eaves and the original wood frame six over six double hung windows, which helps the structure to retain its historic integrity from 1936.

Narrative Description

Located within Millard County, in the small town of Lyndyl, Utah, The Princess Recreation Hall/Lyndyl LDS Meetinghouse is currently being used for the town hall. In spite of a 1983 addition, the structure has kept its historic integrity by retaining much of the original work from 1914 and the 1936-38 addition. The building was constructed on the corner of Center Street and 100 East, in the north east corner of the public community park. Ball fields can be found south of the building and a sports court is found to the west, divided by a row of several large deciduous trees separating the building from the sports court. Other vegetation around the building includes shrubs and grass. A cement pathway is found along the road on the north and east sides of the building, with unmarked gravel parking adjacent to the concrete sidewalk.

The building was originally constructed in 1914 as a rectangular plan recreation hall with gymnasium and auditorium. The original structure was built on a concrete slab with wood framing and covered with wood siding. This vernacular building was constructed with simplistic detail that was functional rather than decorative. In 1936, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints responded to the demand for a larger place of worship by constructing an addition to the west portion of the building. The new structure used a concrete block foundation which raised the main level of the addition up one-half story and allowed for a full basement. This basement had a coal furnace and coal room along with the classrooms. The new addition was built using wood framing. It did not keep to the original exposed wood siding of the original, but was finished with stucco. The exterior of the original recreation hall was also finished with stucco to match the new exterior. Other simple details were added to the wide eaves to give the building a slightly more formal appearance, with an understated Classical Revival feeling. When completed in 1938, the new Lyndyl LDS church building had an L-shape plan and increased space for meetings and classes, yet the social hall remained open as a community gathering area with wood floors and plaster covered walls. When completed the finished space was approximately 3,620 square feet.

Exterior

The primary façade of the building faces north and has two main segments: the gable end of the 1914 gymnasium section and the side of the perpendicular wing of the 1936-38 LDS meetinghouse addition. The walls are punctuated with two windows on the gable end and three on the broad side of the west wing. The windows are all six-over-six, double-hung wood sash, except for one on the west wing which is a coupled window with one-over-one wood sash. There are also two basement windows set in wells directly below the windows on the west wing.

Both wings feature projecting gabled entry wings/ vestibules. The one on the gymnasium wing projects to the west, and the one on the meetinghouse projects to the north. Each has double doors (which have modern steel replacements), and two windows—one on each side of the vestibule. These have shorter six-over-six double-hung wood sash windows. Also visible on the north elevation is the tall brick chimney projecting from the meetinghouse addition roof near where the wings meet.

The west elevation displays the gable end of the 1936-38 wing with three window openings on the main floor and three directly below these in the basement. The primary entrance to the gymnasium projects from 1914 wing to the west and is similar in configuration to the entry on the 1936-38 addition, with a double doorway of more recent metal doors, and a six-over-six double-hung wood sash windows on either side of the vestibule. The west side of the 1983 fire station addition is apparent and has a single window opening with an aluminum slider. At the corner where this addition and the west wing meet is a small, shed-roofed addition with a single door opening, again with a non-historic metal door this covers a hallway and basement stairwell inside.

The south elevation, being the least visible from either street, has very little detail. On the 1936-38 wing there is a single window at the main level and three basement windows. Again, these are wood sash, similar to the other historic windows on the building. There is also a tall, brick chimney projecting from the roof. At the gable end of the fire station is a window opening in the center (with aluminum slider window) and a door opening to the left side at the ground level and another from the second story. However, the second-story doorway has no landing. Both of the doors for these openings are newer metal doors.

Finally, the east elevation runs unbroken the entire length of the building. This is the long side of the gymnasium and fire station. On the left side of this elevation are the two bays for the fire trucks, which have metal overhead rolling doors. Just to the right of these is a single pedestrian entrance with metal door. The rest of the fenestration on this side consists of four window openings: one that lights the stage area inside, and the other three placed equidistant illuminating the gymnasium. These are all double-hung, six-over-six wood sash.

Interior

From the primary entrance on the north side of the 1936-38 wing, one enters a vestibule then proceeds to the interior of this section. The interior of the addition was designed in a split level format with a full set of stairs to the basement and a half flight to the upper level. The basement below this section has rooms for storage, classrooms a coal furnace and a coal room.

The upper level of the 1936-38 addition has a large room on the west side that was originally used as chapel for church services. Another room to the east of this is divided off by an accordion wall and served as a classroom. There is a small window on the south elevation that provided light to this room. However, this was covered on the exterior when the fire station was added. To the east of this room, and separated by an accordion wall is the back stage area from the gymnasium. The east wall of this area has large built-in cupboards and a single window. A doorway at the northeast corner, next to the stage curtains, provides access to a small stairway leading down to the gymnasium floor. The gymnasium is to the north of this area and is a large open hall with maple flooring. A basketball hoop is on the north end. The ceiling is coved and has fairly old acoustic tile. This room has a separate exterior entrance through a projecting vestibule on the west side. Another doorway at the southwest corner of the gymnasium provides access to an interior stairway leading up to the hall area and a small kitchen. All of the original plaster walls, doors, wood trim and finishes are retained in the 1914-1938 part of the building and very little has been changed or updated except for carpeting on the floors.

The building remained in this design until 1983 when Lyndyl Town moved into the building creating a new use as the town hall. Although no structural changes took place within the existing structure, a fire station was constructed at the south end of the gymnasium/auditorium section and was built using wood frame construction and covered with stucco to match the rest of the structure.

The 1983 fire station addition is accessed from the interior by a doorway from the classroom section of the 1936-38 addition. The door leads to a landing with stairs (behind a door) that go up to the second story of the addition, and a half-flight of stairs that leads to the ground-level hall and rooms of the addition. Two restrooms at the north end of the addition are separated from the garage/vehicle storage area of the fire station by an east/west running hallway. At either end of the hall are exterior exits. At the west end of the hall are located the stairs to the second floor and a second stairwell to the basement rooms. The fire station garage area is a single large, open area with room for two vehicles and equipment.

The building has undergone two building campaigns since the original construction that have seen two major sections added to the building. The first one, 1936-38, made major alterations to the original structure in both form and use. The second, in 1983, added a new use and major addition while making little alteration to the overall appearance. In spite of the non-historic addition, the building still retains historical integrity of the 1930s appearance and is a contributing historic building in the small town of Lyndyl.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance, applicable criteria, justification for the period of significance, and any applicable criteria considerations.)

The Princess Recreation Hall/Lynndyl LDS Meetinghouse is locally significant under Criterion A in the areas of Entertainment/Recreation and Religion, as well as Criteria Consideration A for its historical use as a religious meeting place. Lynndyl Town was established during the railroad expansion era and the Princess Recreation Hall was built meet the needs of the citizens for a social gathering center. Originally constructed in 1914 as a social and recreation place for the community, it was used for sporting events, dances, public meetings, a school house, a movie theater, and even a hospital during the influenza of 1917-18. During its time as a recreation hall it also concurrently served as the meetinghouse for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints' Lynndyl Ward from 1915-1982. Therefore, it is significant in relation to its contribution to the social and religious aspects of Lynndyl. Within the 1914-1964 period of significance, the building had two distinct construction periods: 1914, when the original wood framed building housing the gymnasium and stage was built, and 1936-38, when the meetinghouse expansion was completed. In its one hundred year history the Princess has never been empty and has remained a community center for social gathering from the beginning. It is currently being used as the Lynndyl Town Hall, and has been since 1982 when the Lynndyl LDS Ward was disbanded. In 1983 a section was added to the rear of the building to house the town fire station. In spite of the new construction, the historic portion of the building retains its historical integrity and remains a contributing historic building in the small town of Lynndyl.

Lynddyl History

Lynddyl City is a small isolated community located in Millard County and is home to 106 residents, according to the 2010 US Census. Lynddyl was first established as an unnamed junction for the Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad around 1904. With a depot being constructed and a telegraph line being completed also in 1904, railroad employees began moving into the area around 1907. The name Lynddyl was created in 1904 when the first telegraph operator tried out her new system by sending a message to the next telegraph station. The operator at the other end asked the telegraph woman for her location, she quickly looked at her shoe, which was made in Lynn, Massachusetts, and responded, "This is Lynn." Lynn Junction was then established and later it was changed to Lynddyl, to distinguish the community from another town in Utah named Lynn (Ekins).

According to a May 27, 1993, article in the Millard County Chronicle, the history of Lynddyl's existence is tied directly to the railroad. The first train tracks within the city were laid in 1879 for the purpose of sending trains to the silver mining town of Frisco, to the south. In 1906 the first section house and round house with 18 stalls was constructed, and each were filled with workman repairing and maintaining locomotives. With the rail industry growing, Lynddyl was one of the largest railroad terminals between Omaha, Nebraska, and Los Angeles, California.

Lynddyl was a rough town full of working men, gambling and bootlegging. Yet, the railroad also kept the town alive and brought work to many of its residents (Hellenbrand). With the coming of water in 1912, farmers began settling the area in 1913. Yet, many became discouraged with turning the barren land into fertile fields and left Lynddyl after a short time. During the years of the Great Depression, the town saw decline, yet still had numerous buildings dedicated to the rail industry and still had hundreds of employees. During World War II, the rail yards saw a boost of activity with soldiers and military equipment coming through the community for supplies. However, this soon changed when the technology of the locomotive was altered. New diesel locomotives were able to run faster and longer without being required to have numerous stops. The need to resupply in Lynddyl was no longer required and the back shops were moved to Provo. By 1950, only 8 passenger trains and 6 freight trains rode through the town on a daily bases. With the loss of jobs, many people moved out of the community to find work elsewhere. As time progressed many structures were abandoned and eventually demolished. In the late 1970s and early 1980s new hope was brought to the small town, when the coal-fired Intermountain Power Project plant was constructed nearby. Other than farming, this is the only industry, and population has not increased.

Historical Significance

Recreation/Entertainment

The Princess Recreation Hall is significant in the area of recreation/entertainment as it was the center of all social life for the community. In 1914 the town's people desired a social hall to be constructed for their gatherings and events. F.L. Copenham, Walter Johnson and other community members helped construct the hall. Prior to completion, the first ball was held and was recorded as being a “grand affair.”(Greathouse p. 79) The hall was used for a variety of social and sporting purposes and events. These included a movie theater, a dance hall, and a sporting events center which included a basketball court and collapsible boxing and wrestling ring (Greathouse). According to the Polk and Co.’s Utah Gazetteer, the Princess had several recorded managers, Elmer A. Jacob (1918-1919), GW Sudbury (1924-1925) and Elmer Banks (1927-1928).

Princess Recreation Hall/Lynndyl LDS
Meetinghouse

County and State

The Princess truly served as multi-functional building in this small town. During the day it was used as the school house and at night a gymnasium. On Saturday nights it was the local dance hall, while on Sunday it became a place for religious worship. During the influenza pandemic of 1917 and 1918, the population of Lynndyl was devastated. Because of the population size and isolation of the town, there was no hospital to serve the health needs of the community. In order to deal with the many sick who required increased observation the Princess was put into use as a makeshift hospital. The building’s use as a hospital was short-lived, as was its former use as a place of education. When the flu threat was over a new school was constructed adjacent to the hall and opened for students in 1919.¹

Religion

The Princess Recreation Hall/Lynndyl LDS Ward Building is significant in the area of Religion under Criteria Consideration A because of the dual role of the building as the primary social and religious-use space in the community. Although there were some informal Sunday schools being held in different homes, there were no other religious organizations in Lynndyl other than the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which was common for most communities in Utah. The Lynndyl LDS Ward, which met in The Princess, was the only ward (parish) for the religion found in the area. In 1915, not long after the recreation hall was completed and put into use, the LDS Church purchased the building to use as a meetinghouse (King). This did not end its use as a recreation hall, however. Even though the ward used the space as a meetinghouse, the structure remained significant in regard to the social aspect of the community as a whole. From its inception, the LDS Church championed recreational activity in all the communities it settled in Utah and the surrounding region. Particularly after the turn of the twentieth century, when the Church’s building program became more formalized, it was common to construct “cultural halls” near its meetinghouses which had functions similar to the Princess Recreation Hall, with a basketball court and stage area. Probably because of the small population of Lynndyl, the LDS Church deemed it more feasible to purchase the existing hall and make it a multiple-use building.

As the population of the community increased, more space was needed for the expanding Lynndyl Ward. In 1936, approval was granted by the school board for the ward to meet in the school building while Princess Hall was enlarged to include a formal chapel and classrooms. In 1938, construction was completed and on Saturday, September 10, a celebration was held that included sporting events followed by a banquet and program. Some 700 people were in attendance for the events which ended with a dance in the hall. On Sunday, the building was dedicated by LDS Church President Heber J. Grant. At this time the membership for the Lynddyl Ward was 248 (Greathouse).

Recent Building History

The town continued with stable population for a few years longer, but as steam locomotives switched to diesel, the railroad no longer found it necessary to stop in Lynddyl. As a result jobs decreased and with it, the population. Although population declined over the decades, the building continued in shared public and religious use for several decades.

On Sunday, November 22, 1981, the LDS Stake President announced the Lynddyl Ward would most likely be abandoned at the beginning of 1982. This was a shock to many of the member and devastating to think of their community without a place to worship and meet with friends and neighbors. The ward continued on for another eleven months and on October 20, 1982, the last meetings were held in the Lynddyl Ward Meetinghouse. Alpha Nielson, who wrote the history of the Relief Society² in Lyndyll, stated the following: "No more Lynddyl. No more meeting place. No more cultural hall or public building. A little town with no identity. No heart or soul." (Greathouse). Although the LDS Church no longer met in the building, it did not remain empty for long. Soon after, Lynddyl set up town offices in the building. Along with the new use they established a local fire department and constructed permanent quarters for their vehicles in 1983. The building also continues to be used as a public space for the community, with the gymnasium and stage put in use at various times of the year.

When the IPP power plant finally opened, the population saw a small increase; however it has always remained below 150 residents. In 1990 C.B. Tolbert became mayor and pushed for a beautification of the community. He had the town hall repainted and placed letters on the outside that stated once again "The Princess" (Greathouse). Being the town hall, it has remained a community gather place. Public meetings continue to be held at the building along with recreational activities, dances, pancake breakfasts, holiday turkey dinners, bingo games, basketball and other recreational activities (Greathouse). The Princess Hall has remained throughout Lynddyl City history as the most significant and prominent structure within the community.
